

I am a 3D animator with a background in Fine Arts. That is why I am always eager to address any visual or animation challenge. This profession has taught me valuable lessons, experiences, and tools that will help me throughout my Bootcamp journey because it requires a lot of creativity, organization, and problem-solving skills. There are a lot of processes and steps involved in creating a 3D animation. It includes working with different software and levels of difficulty. Which makes the whole process of creating 3D art long and complex. Regardless, it is always very rewarding to see how I complete and overcome each step required to achieve the goals of a project. A key element in animation is to create a work plan to help organize, assign and keep track of all the tasks essential to complete a specific project. That is how it doesn't matter how difficult or how challenging a project can be. With the help of a timeline, I have always been able to finish it successfully.

As an animator, I am used to long projects that require technical knowledge and hard work. Although it is not easy many times, I always enjoy finding solutions to challenging situations. An example of this was the occasion when I produced a short film for a college project. Where my team and I had to integrate live-action footage with 3D. One scene was particularly difficult because a complex camera movement had to be tracked and aligned with 3D animation in a very short time.

During that experience, I had to learn from scratch how to use a particular compositing software that I had no prior knowledge of in just a couple of weeks because other similar software that I had more experience with did not work properly for that specific scene. By managing my time efficiently, I successfully completed the project. Every morning I wrote down the goals of the day to help me stay focused and took 5 minutes shorts breaks every 40 minutes to keep my levels of anxiety controlled. In addition, I took 30 minutes long walks with my dog to clear my mind by the end of every day. All that helped me with my anxiety.

I am a person focused on wanting to learn as much as possible. So, I can create different kinds of projects that integrate in a way or another digital animation. I am very hard working and like to study so I can stay up to date about new trends, grow professionally, and increase my knowledge in technology. That is why I always keep myself looking for new opportunities to learn something new and discover other ways to achieve any challenge I could have, with efficiency and positivity.
